¹ There are 15 full ministers, seven secretaries of State (deputy/junior ministers) and one government Commissioner composing the government.

² The proportion of women in cabinet is 33.3% if one only counts the full ministers (the five female members of cabinet are all full ministers – the same proportion can be found in the ‘inner cabinet’ consisting in the PM and the Deputy PMs; lower-level executive seats are therefore exclusively male), and 22.7% if one excludes only the government Commissioner.

³ The average age among full ministers is 46.7; it goes up to 47.7 when one counts also Secretaries of State.

The number of seats for Belgium in the European Parliament was further reduced from 24 to 22 in 2009 (it was 25 in 1999). As for the European elections, the country is divided in three electoral colleges, this means that the two main language communities sent one MEP less than in 2004 whilst the guaranteed German-speaking seat remained. In French-speaking Belgium both of the two largest parties PS and MR lost one seat whereas the Greens gained one. In Flanders the Socialists also lost one seat, and so did the extreme-right VB. The Lijst De Decker therefore managed to get its first elected MEP. In the German-speaking community, the Christian Social Party kept its mandate.

3. Changes in cabinet composition; new cabinet composition

Changes in cabinet

For composition of Van Rompuy I, see Rihoux et al. (2009: 906-907); this cabinet was installed on 30 December 2008 and received the vote of confidence in Parliament on 2 January.

There was a major reshuffle in the aftermath of June regional and European elections, and more precisely in mid-July at the time of cabinet formation at the regional level. After the reshuffle, the federal government consisted in 15 ministers, 7 secretaries of State and one government commissioner (the latter was added to the previous situation). The balance of forces within the coalition also changed. CD&V now had 5 full ministerial posts (instead of 4 previously), increasing its overall weight in government to 7 (instead of 6 previously) and Open VLD kept 4 posts but one was downgraded (the new position as government commissioner instead of a full minister position) as a consequence of the appointment of Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Karel De Gucht as European Commissioner. The French-speaking parties all kept their previous number of executive positions.

On 19 November, Herman Van Rompuy was selected as first President of the European Council by the heads of state of the 27 EU countries. Therefore he submitted his resignation to the king on 25 November and was immediately replaced by fellow CD&V Yves Leterme. The Leterme II Cabinet was formed on that day. Inge Vervotte (CD&V), who had quit the Cabinet when the Leterme I Cabinet had to resign on 19 December 2008 (Rihoux et.al. 2009: 909), returned to the Cabinet as minister on 25 November as well.

4. Changes in Parliament

Only few changes occurred in federal upper and lower chambers as indirect effect of the Regional and European elections held in June. Concerning the allocation of seats between parties, some minor changes were brought about by defections. The PS Senator Anne-Marie Lizin, (see below) was fired by her party while continuing to seat at the upper house. The cartel between the SP.a and a small left-wing regionalist party (SLP; see Rihoux et.al. 2009:
910) split in December, when the latter joined Groen!. This defection was not a big deal since both parties stand in the opposition at the federal level, and since the SLP only had one single senator, G. Lambert. Besides these two changes, the allocation of seats between parties for the federal chambers did not change, as an agreement between all main parties determines the allocation of the 21 senators that are indirectly elected through the Regional elections.

More important are the changes concerning individuals MPs. Some of them renounced to their federal seat to occupy a better function according to their profile. For example, Jean-Marc Nollet and Philippe Henry (Ecolo) resigned to enter the Walloon Government, Freya Van Den Bossche (SP.a) did the same to Flemish Government. Bart De Wever, head of the autonomist Flemish party NV-A, quit the federal Parliament to seat in the Flemish Parliament, and so did Isabelle Durant (Ecolo) to become vice-president of the European Parliament.

5. Issues in National Politics

The Flemish party system was confronted with a couple of leadership changes. First, Bart Somers, the leader of the VLD, tried to bribe a remote backbencher of the LDD to defect to his party. This would have cost the LDD a considerable part of its public finance, sinking under the minimum number of MPs to get fully subsidised. When the details of the secret deal came out in the press, it created a scandal. Somers eventually resigned after his party’s heavy defeat at the Flemish elections. Hence, new party leader elections were organised in December, opposing a former Flemish minister, Marino Keulen, backed by the troïka that had control led the party for 20 years (Verhofstadt, De Gucht and Dewael) and young Alexander De Croo (son of a very prominent secondary leader). The latter won with 55% of the member vote. It symbolises the end of the reign of the troika and the take-over of the party by the more Flemish-oriented generation.

Jean-Marie Dedecker (LDD) got his own scandal, when it came out that he had hired a private detective to discover potential criminal behaviour of VLD vice-PM Karel De Gucht and his family, regarding insider trading following the Fortis crisis. In the SP.a, the president Caroline Gennez, the managed to dump the most popular and experienced minister of her party, Frank Vandenbroucke (former party president and federal vice-PM). While he was, as incumbent Flemish vice-Minister president, one of the main negotiators of the new Flemish government agreement, he was replaced as minister by a technocrat. When the shady manoeuvres organised by the entourage of Gennez to achieve this change came out in detail in the press, her already shaky leadership position was further eroded. As for the Flemish greens of Groen!, they elected a new president, Wouter Van Besien, after the longserving de facto leader, Mike Vogels, took the responsibility for losing the Flemish elections. This apparatchik (incumbent vice-chair but holding only a local elected office), was the only candidate and was endorsed by 90% of the party members.

Overall there were less turbulences in the less competitive French-speaking party system. CDH strongwoman Joëlle Milquet, both party president since 1999 and Vice-prime minister in the federal government, had promised to hold elections to find a successor. Eventually, in December, a ‘ticket’ between herself and Benoît Lutgen (minister of agriculture and environment in the Walloon government) largely won by 87% of the party members’ vote. The arrangement is that Milquet will remain president up till the formation of the next federal government after the next general elections (i.e. 2011 at the latest), after which Lutgen will take over. In Ecolo, a smooth transition also took place: Isabelle Durant having been elected as MEP in June (see above), she was replaced in November as party ‘co-president’ (together with Walloon Jean-Michel Javaux) by young Sarah Turine from Brussels. Indeed the party statutes stipulate that the two party co-presidents must be male and female and must originate from the two different regions (Wallonia and Brussels).

The situation was much more tense in the MR, where the leadership of Didier Reynders (also Vice-prime minister and minister of finance in the federal government) was contested after disappointing results at the June regional elections and a prolonged stay in opposition both in the Walloon and Brussels regions. A group of ‘rebels’ gathering quite a number of party notables called for an ‘aggiornamento’ congress and put Reynders’ line and position into question. Eventually, after three months of open crisis, Reynders managed to save his position in September and to remain president, but within-party tensions subsisted.

On 29 November, a significant new party was created with the ambition of becoming a ‘national’ party (i.e. presenting lists on both sides of the linguistic border): the Parti Populaire – PersonenPartij (PP - People’s Party). It was launched by Mischaël Modrikamen, prominent French-speaking lawyer and opinion leader during the ‘Fortisgate’ scandal (Rihoux et.al. 2009: 909), and Rudy Aernoudt, a Flemish intellectual who has served in ministerial cabinets both in Wallonia, Flanders and at the federal level. The PP ambitions to cover the whole right-wing side of the political spectrum, with explicit reference to the French UMP or the Spanish Partido Popular, and also to fight against political corruption. The first indications in 2009 were that the PP was gaining much more momentum in French-speaking Belgium in terms of local development.

Naturally, 2009 being an electoral year with the regional elections, the ethnolinguistic debates remained high on the agenda, as the main parties campaigned on their respective sides of the ‘linguistic border’ – the core adversarial issue being: which institutional model to negotiate within the next few months and years. While most Francophone parties still privileged a ‘modernized federalist’ model, most Flemish parties campaigned in favour of a confederal model. The more radical Flemish parties on that front (NV-A, the VB and the LDD) pushed further, the ultimate goal being to obtain eventually the independence of Flanders. The continued failure (since the 2007 elections) to reach an overall agreement on this fundamental issue in spite of the continuation of rounds of negotiation, and in particular the stalemate on the issue of the bilingual ‘Brussels-Halle-Vilvoorde’ constituency and on the issue of the non-nomination of three francophone mayors in the Flemish periphery of Brussels (Rihoux et.al. 2008: 924), allowed the more radical parties to gain ground during the respective regional campaigns.

In terms of other substantive topics across the country, just as in 2008, the most important themes in 2009 were the economic, the judicial and the societal ones. On the economic and financial front, the preceding year’s downturn led to a record number of bankruptcies and redundancies, as well in Flanders as in the Walloon Region. One major social movement this year was the one around milk producers and livestock farmers. They demonstrated with tractors and organized dramatic actions (dumping milk in fields for instance) against their lost revenues and their fear of unemployment due to the drop in milk prices.

In 2009, the state deficit grew to some 6.5 % of the Gross Domestic Product. The social security deficit doubled year over year. In October however, the Federal government reached an agreement on the 2010-2011 budget, without any new taxations and without social security cuts. The electricity and banking sectors will contribute to the budget effort. The former because the closure of the nuclear plants scheduled for 2015 in the 2003 legislation will be postponed for ten years, as announced by Minister of Climate and Energy, Paul Magnette (PS). The latter because the state has become the banks’ insurer and has given them the guarantee to bail them out in case of crisis.
On the judicial front, the soap opera of affairs and political-financial scandals connected with the PS proceeded, involving this time Didier Donfut, the Walloon Minister of Social Affairs and Public Health. Senator Anne-Marie Lizin (PS) was accused of misappropriating funds (Rihoux et al. 2009: 911) and stepped down in March. She had been suspended from the PS in January and was expelled from the party in November. In fact, this year the political world was not alone in being involved in scandals, the judicial was too, as Francine De Tanndt, President of the Brussels Trade Court, was suspected of making false entries, and Christine Schurmans was accused of a breach of secrecy of proceedings in favour of the Government in the Fortis affair which eventually lead to the takeover of the Belgian bank by the BNP Paribas Group (Rihoux et al. 2009: 911).

At the end of December, the Court of Appeal of Brussels gave its verdict in the trial of the DHKP-C, a Turkish left-wing political organization. It was the fourth and the last resumption of this trial, on the basis of Belgium's new antiterrorist law (Rihoux et al. 2007: 896-897). By refusing to recognize this organization as a criminal one, the Court highlighted the difficulties in applying this antiterrorist legislation while respecting the Constitution and democracy.

In July 2009, Van Rompuy's new cabinet finally reached an agreement implementing the government's March 2008 commitment to regularize a number of categories of undocumented immigrants on the basis of concrete standards (Rihoux et al. 2009: 912). Despite the Council of State's challenge to the legality of this agreement, the new Secretary of State of Migration and Asylum Policy, Melchior Wathelet (CDH), was able to enforce it exercising his discretionary powers.

In September, what is referred to as the 'islamic scarf' was forbidden in the Flemish Community school system. Worthy of note, in Belgium, the debate on the scarf has become a major issue in the media and the political debate.
